We have to dynamically allocate the array of "child pointers". We are implementing a class template, which means <unsigned int N> could be large and the runtime stack may not be enough to hold all the arrays. In addition, the exact size of N may be unknown at compile time, since that size could come from user input during runtime; and a statically allocated array cannot compile for an unknown size.