No, y.cpp will not compile. When the compiler compiles y.cpp, it can only see the contents inside "x.hpp", which only contains the declaration of the template and not the definition of member functions. In other words, the compiler can only see contents in "x.hpp" and not in "x.cpp". So when we try to instantiate the class using the template, the compiler will fail to compile.